Not illustrated. 1919 Excerpt: . . . PLAYING WITH BABY HAT a wonderful thing it would be if you could get inside the mind of a little child--an infant--and look out through the babys eyes! Of course, you did do that once; you were it; but you were so busy taking things in, registering your first impressions of the amazing world in which you found yourself, choosing between the things you did that proved useful and the things that didnt get you anywhere, that you forgot to remember how things looked to you. Now you feel as if you had always been here, as if you came anyway, with a ready-made knowledge of heat and cold, hardness and softness, surfaces and shapes, colors and sounds. By no means; you had to learn them all; you had to learn even the difference between that which was you and that which was the rest of the world. One of the first and best ways of learning these things was the plays you had with your mother, I dont mean the games you played after you were pretty well along in childhood; I mean the very first things, when you didnt know anything at all; when your tiny fingers reached out and clutched the air; when you hadnt learned to direct even your eyes; when your little legs just sprawled about without intention or direction. Gradually you began to notice--mothers hands pushing against your feet, mothers finger in your grasp, mothers voice crooning little...
