Not illustrated. 1886 Excerpt: . . . has been treated to you on this early style of architecture, of which the following figures will exemplify; and I shall now commence with their decorations, relief, and sculpture, principally derived from nature. It is more reasonable to suppose that the palm tree was originally used for ornamenting their chapters, as many of them are formed of the scaly portion around the shaft, and the branches springing to form the capital; but, in fact, we may trace the imitation of natural objects in every portion of an Egyptian column. Square and octagon columns have also been formed; and figures were introduced, as caryatid, but chiefly used as pilasters. The most common form of a capital was that of the calyx of a plant, chiefly the lotus; which simple plant received the most graceful modifications from the Egyptian mason, for the purpose of architectural ornament; even the...
